

GLOBAL JUSTICE AND THE REALIZATION OF A UNIVERSAL DEFINITION: A CONTEMPORARY APPROACH

KANCHAN YADAV¹

In the modern era of globalization, the concept of global justice has gained significant popularity. Particularly in the context of various international organization, treaties, and norms that have been created to ensure human rights, justice, and peace for all, it is undesirable that no universal definition for global justice has been attained yet, even though mankind is constantly striving for the same. However, the path to creating such a definition is paved with a number of barriers – cultural, political, social, etc. The primary concern seems to be that the concept of justice itself is not universal in nature – what is justice in the developing society may not be so in a developed society. For that reason, such a universal definition continues to elude mankind. This paper provides an analysis as to why such a universal definition is required, continues with a detailed analysis of such barriers, and concludes with some recommendations as to possible ways forward regarding this issue.

Keywords: Global justice, justice, international community, human rights.
