VALUE OF OBJECTION DOCTRINES UNDER INTERNATIONAL LEGAL SYSTEM

*MANU SHARMA

With increasing influence of International law in the recent times, States all around the world are joining hands together to maintain and promote the ideas of peace and harmony for which they are consenting to follow the obligations of various International instruments like conventions, treaty, agreement etc. Apart from these primary sources of International laws there are other sources also, like International customs, general principles accepted as law and other subsidiary sources. However, there might arise a situation where a State is not willing to be bound by any treaty obligation or a customary International law due to some reason. So can they do it at the stage of where any rule or practice has not yet been recognized as customary International law and what about the situation if a State resists the obligations that arise from the binding nature of customary law? So this essay specifically deals with the concept of objection by the State to be bound by the any treaty or customary International law and its significance in the present International legal system.
